

Cutting Edge Container

When you're using lots of screws or nails for a job, you need something to keep them in, right? Some people carry a small box or a bucket. Others use a pouch that ties around their waist. Then there are the inventive people who use things like paper coffee cups, plastic bowls, or milk jugs.

I've used most of these things to carry screws or nails around. Heck, I've even used an old rubber boot to hold nails, but I've never used something like this. Someone cut the top off of a soda can and dumped screws in to make a very hazardous container.

Now I have to admit, the size and shape of the can is perfect for the job. The only problem is that every time you put your fingers in to get a screw, you run the risk of slicing your finger on the sharp edge. Not a good thing.

Folks, it's OK to improvise if you need a container to carry nails or screws around on the job. Just make sure that what you use isn't going to hurt you worse than the things inside.
